With all the controversy about the slaughter of horses and the moratoriums that have been put in place, there has been a rise in the number of persons being scammed by unscrupulous "horse traders" that are doing anything they can to dump lame and unsound horses on the unsuspecting public over the Internet.

To entice prospective buyers, these Internet scammers have taken to such tactics as breeding unsound mares and convincing the unsuspecting buyer that they are getting a great two-for-one deal and at a "great price".

Stop here and implant this in your brain. There are very specific reasons why the "horse traders" got their name.

A party who bought two Percherons from a farm in Minnesota recently contacted me. The really good news to the buyer was that both mares had been bred to a highly regarded stud and were in foal.

To protect themselves, as prudent purchasers should do, the purchaser had a vet check done in Minnesota. The vet was recommended by the seller. Anything smell fishy here?

Anyway the vet there said the mares were sound, in great shape and confirmed them to be in foal. The seller was also generous enough to offer a 30-day full and complete money back guarantee to the buyer, if the buyer was not completely satisfied with the horses.

The mares were delivered to Georgia and it was obvious as they were being led off the truck that both were lame. The buyer said to the hauler that the horses were lame and he didn't want them, "Please return them to the seller." The hauler, incidentally affiliated with the seller, said that he had to go to Florida and if the buyer would just keep the two mares at his farm for a day or so, he would be back by to pick them up. Big Mistake.

The hauler never returned. So what's a person to do? Horses bought in Minnesota via the Internet and delivered in Georgia present all kinds of jurisdictional issues.

As for the vet check, obviously there was some tomfoolery going on there. And as for the hauler, never take delivery of any animal you believe to be unsound. Scamming people on the Internet is just one more form of horse theft, so beware.

As for the 30-day money back guarantee, well what do you think happened about that?

Here's my legal solution to this quandary and to the trials and tribulations of buying a horse through the Internet. Don't do it. If it's too good to be true, it's not.

In another incident, a party bought a quarter horse from Oklahoma via the Internet. The story is that this horse was supposed to be a hum dinger of a barrel racer. Was the horse sound as advertised? Seller insisted, oh yes. And for a mere $5,000 this exceptional barrel racer was purchased. The only problem was that the horse had no teeth. This case is or has recently been litigated in Georgia because the Internet provider was a company registered in Georgia.

What state has jurisdiction in cases like these? There's a growing basis in law that the courts in the purchaser's state have jurisdiction over the seller, even though the seller is in another state. That seems to apply to horses or anything purchased via the Internet.

This should help a little bit, but to be realistic, ask these questions: How are you going to collect your judgment in this faraway state? How much money are you going to have to spend to get the judgment?

Here's my legal solution to this quandary and to the trials and tribulations of buying a horse through the Internet. Don't do it. If it's too good to be true, it's not.

If you don't know horses well enough to completely evaluate them yourself, pay an expert 15 percent of the purchase price to have a veterinarian complete a purchase examination of the horse. Don't take physical delivery until a veterinarian has done a through job, in your presence, of examining the animal.

If there is the slightest doubt about the soundness of the legs, have the veterinarian do an ultrasound or X-ray the legs and the joints.

If you do take physical delivery, make it conditional on a veterinarian check with the understanding that the horse can be returned if the vet finds any problems whatsoever. At the same time, in this situation, always withhold most or all of the purchase price from the seller until the vet check is done.
